Reds Hit Britain in Festive Trial of Prof

Moscow, July 22 (Reuters) — Moscow used the trial of a London college lecturer today as a stage to attack a Russian exile organization. It accused the British Embassy here of having links with it.

Gerald Brooke, 28, a lecturer in Russian at Holborn College, London, confessed to charges that he visited Russia on instructions of the organization, N.T.S. (Popular Labor Alliance), and smuggled in subversive literature to pass on to Russian contacts.

Arrested in April

Brooke was arrested in a Moscow apartment in April and has been held in Lubyanka Prison ever since.

Western correspondents and spectators were banned from the afternoon session of the show trial—held in a small theatre before 600 Russian spectators. Outside, a buffet was set up to feed the spectators with beer, chocolate and smoked salmon sandwiches.

Turned by Contact

According to the 40-minute indictment read by Judge Lev Al-mazov, Brooke's main contact in Russia was to have been a young doctor named Yury Konstantinov. The indictment disclosed that it was Konstantinov who gave Brooke away. It described the doctor as "patriot of the fatherland."

The charge said that if Brooke failed to deliver his documents to Russian contacts they were to be given to a British Embassy official named Anthony Bishop for returning to Britain by diplomatic post. This was denied by the British Embassy.
